

Quantum condensed matter and challenges for neutrons

Alan Tennant

Oak Ridge National Laboratory

In this talk I will cover emerging questions in condensed matter involving quantum and topological systems. Neutrons are essential to making progress on these systems and this will be illustrated by the search for new phases of matter and their exotic excitations. These materials provide new challenges for neutron science and the way that emerging technologies and instrumentation can address these will be covered.